

Four clicks tell you what your ad is chasing.

Most people judge it by the creative.
Wrong screen entirely.

Ads Manager shows one number by default: cost per lead. That's step one of three.

Cost per lead only tells you if the ad is cheap. Not if it works.

Step two: cost per conversation. How much you paid for someone to actually reply.

Across nine ad accounts, 7,341 people submitted a lead form. Only 876 became a real conversation.

That gap between a form fill and a reply is where most budgets quietly leak.

Step three: cost per customer. The number nobody puts on a dashboard for you.

Meta never sees whether a lead became a sale, unless you build that back in yourself.

Check this before the creative. It decides who Meta goes and finds.

Three numbers, not one. Cheap leads and paying customers are two different products.

Jothi Swaroop.

PERFORMANCE MARKETING & AI SYSTEMS

JOTHISWAROOP.COM

@JOTHISWAROOP.AI · IN/JOTHISWAROOP

