Google just let you rank your own campaigns by priority.

Most people will read this as a small feature update. It is not.

Every account with more than one campaign splits a budget between them, whether you choose how or not.

Before this, that split followed Google's own rules, mostly invisible to you.

Now there is a setting that says: fund this campaign first, before any other.

That is different from a Performance goal, the setting that tells Google what counts as a win.

Priority decides who gets paid first. Goal decides what paying off looks like.

Most accounts have set the second one and never touched the first.

09

If your best campaign has been starved while a weak one got funded, this is why.

Open Google Ads, go to each campaign's settings, and look for the new priority and allocation controls before you touch anything else.
